BROADCAST JOURNALISM

SHARE YOUR VOICE.

Broadcast Journalism students receive a grounding in general journalistic principles, practices, ethics and law, and they receive advanced instruction tailored to the field of broadcast news. Broadcast news skills extend from traditional radio and television media to digital media platforms. Broadcast Journalism students learn how to disseminate news across these platforms to prepare for careers in front of or behind the camera.

WHAT WILL I STUDY?

Building on the Journalism Division Core, the Broadcast Journalism option teaches students the foundational elements of visual storytelling. With a focus on video production, visual communication, and broadcast news dissemination, students learn to apply sophisticated approaches to deliver news across multiple media platforms.

Broadcast Journalism majors study and practice basic and advanced broadcast news skills with an emphasis on gathering, writing, shooting, editing, anchoring, and reporting news.

This foundation offers students opportunities to produce news behind the camera or deliver it as on air talent.

WHAT CAREERS CAN I PURSUE?

The skills required of a broadcast journalist are the foundation for any job that requires researching, talking to people, asking questions and synthesizing what is learned into a coherent report.

You will find our alumni at commercial and public radio and television stations, working in front of and behind the camera or microphone as reporters, producers, announcers, news anchors and sports anchors, covering breaking news and longer investigative pieces.

Our alumni have won Emmy and regional broadcasting awards, and some students who work at WEIU-TV's News Watch have won collegiate Emmy Awards before they have graduated. Besides traditional news jobs, they also work as spokespeople and social media managers for government, corporate and non-profit organizations.
